Abstract

This workshop intends to intensively discuss draft book chapters for a collective volume on competing narratives on the coronavirus pandemic in Asia. We adopt a healthy form of analytic eclecticism (Sil and Katzenstein 2010) that allows for building arguments that bear on problems of interest to academics and practitioners informed by different research traditions. We believe that it is both possible and desirable to engage simultaneously with the “applied” question of how actors use narratives to influence each other and the “(meta)theoretical” question of how subjects are constituted through narration. In so doing, the volume will broaden our understanding of narrative-making and their conceptual and foreign policy implications. Following the approach of Foreign Policy Analysis (FPA; also found in Classical Realism), both system-level factors and domestic factors will be examined. At the same time, our contributors draw heavily from Constructivism. Authors based in Asia will take on respective local narratives head on by taking local language sources seriously. Their analysis of the covered country’s pandemic narrative will be discussed in relation to the competing PRC and US narratives, considering the effects thus produced. Two separate chapters will be dedicated to the US and the PRC as narrative entrepreneurs, facing risks and opportunities brought by the global coronavirus outbreak.
